Background of Lorrin Andrews

Lorrin Andrews (1795–1868) was a missionary, educator, and linguist who played a pivotal role in documenting the Hawaiian language during the early period of Western contact with the Hawaiian Islands. Born in Connecticut, Andrews arrived in Hawaii in the early 19th century as part of the American Protestant missionary movement. His dedication to education and language preservation led him to become one of the first to systematize Hawaiian vocabulary and grammar. Andrews served as a teacher and later as the principal of Lahainaluna Seminary, where he promoted literacy and Hawaiian language studies. His linguistic skills and deep respect for Hawaiian culture enabled him to produce a dictionary that was both accurate and culturally sensitive, bridging the gap between Western scholarship and indigenous knowledge.

Creation and Compilation of the Dictionary

The dictionary of the Hawaiian language compiled by Lorrin Andrews was one of the earliest published works to document the Hawaiian language in a formalized manner. Compiled in the 1860s, the dictionary was the result of years of meticulous research, collaboration with native speakers, and linguistic analysis. Andrews gathered vocabulary from oral traditions, written texts, and everyday usage, ensuring that the dictionary reflected authentic Hawaiian speech. The compilation process involved translating Hawaiian words into English, providing definitions, and including examples of usage where possible. This work was groundbreaking at the time, as it provided a valuable resource for missionaries, scholars, and Hawaiians alike to access the language in a systematic format.
