Afgantsy: The Russians in Afghanistan 1979-1989 by Rodric Braithwaite is a comprehensive account of the Soviet Union's tumultuous decade-long involvement in Afghanistan. This conflict, often referred to as the Soviet-Afghan War, was not only a pivotal moment in the Cold War but also a significant chapter in the history of Afghanistan and the Soviet Union itself. Braithwaite, a former British diplomat and historian, delves deeply into the political, social, and military aspects of this conflict, offering insights that resonate well beyond the battlefield.

Historical Context

The Soviet Union's Strategic Interests

In the late 1970s, Afghanistan was strategically important to the Soviet Union for several reasons:

1. Geopolitical Position: Afghanistan shared borders with several key countries, including Iran, Pakistan, and China. Control over Afghanistan would give the USSR a foothold in South Asia.
2. Ideological Expansion: The Soviet leadership aimed to spread communism and viewed the Afghan government's leftist orientation as an opportunity to expand their influence.
3. Buffer Zone: A friendly regime in Kabul would serve as a buffer against Western influence in the region, particularly from the United States and its allies.

The Rise of the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA)

The PDPA, a communist party, came to power in Afghanistan through a coup in 1978, known as the Saur Revolution. The party's radical reforms, including land redistribution and women's rights, were met with fierce resistance from traditionalist segments of Afghan society. The unrest escalated, prompting the Soviet Union to intervene militarily in December 1979.

The Invasion and Initial Engagement

Operation Storm-333

The Soviet invasion commenced with Operation Storm-333, which aimed to secure Kabul and eliminate key Afghan leaders. This operation saw:

- The deployment of approximately 100,000 Soviet troops.
- A swift takeover of the capital, Kabul, but significant resistance from Afghan mujahideen fighters.

Military Strategy and Tactics

The Soviet military employed various strategies:

1. Conventional Warfare: Initially, the Soviets used conventional forces, tanks, and heavy artillery to suppress resistance.
2. Air Support: The use of helicopters and fighter jets was crucial in maintaining control over key regions.
3. Search and Destroy Missions: Ground forces engaged in operations to eradicate mujahideen strongholds,
