Life and Context of Augustine of Hippo

Early Life and Education

Augustine was born to a mixed-religion family; his father, Patricius, was a pagan, while his mother, Monica, was a devout Christian. This duality played a crucial role in shaping Augustine's early views on religion and morality. He was educated in rhetoric in Carthage, where he was exposed to various philosophical ideas, including Manichaeism, a religion that combined elements of Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and Buddhism.

- His tumultuous relationship with his mother, who desired his conversion to Christianity.
- His academic success and eventual teaching position in rhetoric.
- His brief involvement with the Manichaean sect, which later influenced his understanding of good and evil.

Conversion and Baptism

Augustine's journey toward Christianity was marked by a profound internal struggle. His conversion, famously recounted in "Confessions," occurred in 386 CE in Milan, spurred by the preaching of Bishop Ambrose and the influence of his mother. He was baptized the following year, which marked a significant turning point in his life.

- Key factors in Augustine's conversion:
