History of Blow Molds

Blow molds originated in the mid-20th century as a way to produce lightweight, durable decorations for the home and garden. The process involves inflating heated plastic into a mold, allowing manufacturers to create intricate designs at a lower cost compared to traditional materials.

Early Development

- 1940s-1950s: The first blow molds were primarily used for industrial purposes. However, as plastic became popular, manufacturers started using this technique for decorative items.
- 1960s: The introduction of blow-molded decorations coincided with the rise of suburban culture in the United States. Families began to embrace outdoor decorations for holidays, leading to an explosion in demand.
- 1970s-1980s: This period saw the peak of blow mold production, with companies like Empire, Union Products, and General Foam becoming household names for seasonal décor.

What Are Blow Molds Made Of?

Blow molds are typically made from:

- Polyethylene: A lightweight, durable plastic that holds color well and can withstand various weather conditions.
- Polypropylene: Known for its strength and resistance to chemicals, this type of plastic is also used in some blow molds.
- Paint: Blow molds are often painted with lead-free, UV-stabilized paints to resist fading and chipping.
