The colonial foundations of the United States saw the establishment of several types of colonies, each with distinct governance and social structures. These can be classified as follows:

Charter Colonies

Interactions with Native Americans

As European settlers established colonies, their interactions with Indigenous peoples varied widely, leading to both cooperation and conflict.

Trade and Cooperation

- Trade Relations: Fur trade became a significant aspect of colonial economies, particularly for the French and Dutch, who engaged in extensive trading networks with various tribes.

Conflict and Displacement
